What's a health policy issue that personally motivates you?

Neuroscience research. I am fortunate to work for a co-chair of the Congressional Neuroscience Caucus, but it's also personal to me. My grandfather had Parkinson's. He was one of the smartest people I've ever met, and it reduced not just his physical capabilities but mental faculties as well.

What does leadership look like to you at this stage in your career?

Enabling others while also providing strong mentorship. In my opinion, a good leader trusts those working for them and is willing to help them grow and learn, whether through new challenges or instruction around mistakes that were made.

What's a strength you bring to health policy?

A unique background. I started my career in health care finance and got a front row seat to how hospital CFOs make decisions about system finances, debt issuance, and growth opportunities.
